JAMES R. PARKS
CLERK, STATE GRAND JURY

At a session of the State Grand Jury of South Carolina, convened in Columbia, South Carolina, on November 16, 2018, the State Grand Jurors present upon their oath:

INTRODUCTION

Contraband is readily available to inmates in the South Carolina Department of Corrections ("SCDC"), despite the best efforts of many SCDC staff to stem the tide. An extensive, sophisticated, and very lucrative black market has existed within the prison system for the sale and delivery of contraband. The operations of this black market require the assistance of people both inside and outside of the prison walls.

The most prevalent types of contraband include pounds of loose cigarette tobacco, cell phones and cell phone accessories, marijuana, alcoholic beverages, and Synthetic Cannabinoid, also known as "K2", "Deuce" or "Spice". Other drugs, such as methamphetamine, suboxone, cocaine, and crack cocaine are also trafficked within the walls of the state prisons.

The methods used to introduce the contraband into the state prisons are varied and limited only by the ingenuity of the inmates and the willingness of staff and people on the outside to assist.

Inmate leaders coordinate their own extremely profitable black market ventures, and essentially employ people both inside and outside the prisons to assist in obtaining and distributing the contraband. These inmate leaders take orders from inmate customers, marshal resources on the outside to gather and package the contraband, arrange for delivery times and smuggling methods into the prison system, and coordinate distribution and delivery not only within a single institution but also from institution to institution. These inmate leaders use sophisticated and varied financial mechanisms to get paid and to pay all their "employees", with methods designed to hide the true source of the income.

Friends, wives, girlfriends, relatives, former inmates, and others all play a significant role in gathering the contraband items and packaging them, not only for ease of smuggling into the various institutions, but also for distinguishing packages for delivery to the right customers among the prisoners. Color coded tape is often used on the packages of contraband to help the distribution network determine which packages go to which customers in which institution.

The contraband can command high prices in the prisons, and prices go up as the security level of the institution increases. For example, in a low level prison even a small medicine "cap" of tobacco can bring as much as $25. Cell phones can bring hundreds if not thousands of dollars.

The contraband trade in the prisons drives not only a lucrative black market but also contributes to gang power, gang rivalries, and gang violence among the competing factions within the prison walls.

One such mechanism by which contraband has been smuggled into the South Carolina Department of Corrections is through the dairy facilities at the Wateree Correctional Institution in Sumter County. The dairy at Wateree Correctional Institution provides milk to the institutions within all of the prison system. The dairy facilities and pasture land surround the Wateree prison but are not within its secure perimeter.

Inmates designated to work in the prison dairy facilities thus would leave the prison yard during the daily work shifts. These inmates were typically only supervised by few civilian staff and had access to various dairy and farm facilities and pasture land, which is not otherwise fenced or secured.

Contraband was delivered by coconspirators on the outside and left during the night at predetermined hiding locations on the prison dairy farmland. The contraband was typically in large duffle bags, containing cell phones, tobacco, drugs, and other items individually packaged and marked with the color coded tape. Inmates on the dairy work shifts retrieved the contraband on the farmland and took it back to the dairy facilities.

The inmates on the dairy work shifts would then use plastic wrap to roll some of the contraband into small capsules called "eggs", which would be placed in the rectums of the inmates to be smuggled back into the Wateree prison yard once the work shifts were over.

The inmates secreted the majority of the contraband into the milk crates, which were packaged on pallets and ultimately trucked to all of the institutions with the system. The packages were secretly marked so inmates who assist at the receiving institutions would know which ones contain contraband. In this manner SCDC's food distribution network was used against itself to facilitate the contraband trade.

Another manner by which contraband was introduced into the prison system was through a bakery in Columbia that sells bread to the South Carolina Department of Corrections for consumption by inmates throughout the various institutions. Inmates working in the Food Services warehouse at Goodman Correctional Institution would be assigned to accompany truck drivers to the bakery to help load the bread. Once there, the inmates would sneak boxes of contraband which had been hidden adjacent to the bakery onto the truck, where it would be returned back within the prison walls. From there, the contraband could be secreted into pallets or packages of foodstuffs that would be delivered out to the various institutions in the entire Department of Corrections system.

Another method by which contraband was smuggled into the prison system involved inmates assigned to work at the State House grounds in Columbia. Co-conspirators on the outside would take contraband and hide it at various locations around the State House and the state office buildings. Inmates on State House work duty would obtain it and return it back within the prison walls for delivery throughout the system.
